Companies spend millions of euros every year advertising their products. Their ads tell us that if we buy their mp3 players, people will admire us more, if we eat their food, we will be happier, and, if we don't wear their clothes, we won't look good.

They use a variety of clever techniques to persuade us to buy their products. Some companies employ famous athletes, singers and actors. They think that if we see our heroes wearing a certain T-shirt, then we will want to wear it, too. Other companies try to make us feel bad for not buying their products: unless we use their products, we will not be good friends or we will put the environment in danger. Other companies use words like 'modern', 'unique' or 'latest' because they believe that if they use such words, we will want to buy their products. Other companies, in order to know what teenagers like, hire 'cool hunters' or 'cultural spies' to infiltrate their world and bring back the latest trends.

Young children and teenagers are important to companies because they have their own purchasing power, they influence their parents' buying decisions and they're the adult consumers of the future. However, we should be careful because advertising uses and influences children and teenagers ,and a healthy society should raise children to be responsible citizens rather than just consumers.
