public about the availability of their products and services. But advertising can accomplish so much more, as in providing information on how to contact the advertiser, where to find the advertiser, who the advertiser is and even what the advertiser's core philosophy may be. Politicians use advertising to tell potential voters what their goals and priorities are. Governments use advertising to tell their citizens how to find special services, and also how to participate in the government. Businesses use advertising to engage with potential customers by telling them an outgoing story about the nature and strengths of their companies and organizations. Business advertisers also

Advertising can be very plain and matter-of-fact or it can be extremely creative, even entertaining. The style of an advertisement may be decided by how competitive the industry of the product or service may be, or it could be that a government agency invokes creative advertising to ensure that the public becomes aware of a very important fact.
